British Decoy Planes During World War II

During World War II, the British employed a variety of decoy tactics to mislead and confuse the enemy. One of the most fascinating strategies involved the use of decoy planes. These dummy aircraft were designed to look like real planes from a distance, fooling enemy reconnaissance and bombers into targeting them instead of actual airfields and military assets.

The British Air Ministry formed a secret department to oversee these deception tactics. They created entire dummy airfields filled with decoy planes, which were often made from wood, canvas, and other materials. These decoy sites were incredibly realistic and could even deceive observers on the ground.

In addition to decoy planes, the British also used other forms of deception, such as dummy tanks and artillery, to create the illusion of larger and more strategically placed forces. These tactics were part of a broader effort to mislead the enemy and protect vital military resources.
